Overall Educational Objective	To acquire a basic knowledge on fundaments and functioning of global and regional level international human rights protection regimes. The course will enable them to have recourse to these mechanisms in cases where their claims concerning rights violations are not duly satisfied by national level protection regimes.
Course Description	This course provides a comprehensive introduction to the law, theory, institutions, and practice of international human rights. It will provide a solid grounding in the historical development of international human rights law and related institutions, as well as contemporary developments in the field. We will look at the relationship between domestic legal systems and international human rights law, as well as existing and proposed regional and international human rights regimes. The course will also explore several current debates in the field, including judicial and non-judicial responses to mass violence, the responsibility to protect and the use of humanitarian intervention, universal jurisdiction, the impact of non-state actors on human rights, as well as the relationship between human rights and development.
